Annenberg Prize for Art and Social Change Awarded to Trump Border Wall Fragments

By Lorna Medejacket

Immigrants rights groups hastened to correct the scores of reporters who called asking if they had played any role in the surprise award of the Annenberg Prize to the curious wall fragments dotting the border between the United States and Mexico.

"STARK ANTITHESIS" IS one of the descriptions of the baffling wall fragments which captivated the Annenberg Foundation's panel of judges.

"We were as surprised as anyone," stated the American Immigration Council, which defends immigrant rights in American courts. "We don't know anything about art."

"It isn't just the obvious dichotomy between form and function," observed one of the Foundation's judges. "It's the fact that the teams that imagined, funded, and built the various wall fragments also had no over-arching awareness of the ultimate message they were sending. It's far beyond the orchestra that practices relentlessly for a performance and then sits entirely still in the performance hall."

"This is a species-wide statement,"

THE LONELY CONTRADICTION that characterizes a wall fragment anyone can walk right by is even more impressive in person.

agreed another judge knocking mud off her boots while working with a team of naturalists documenting species migratory patterns working over, under, and around the wall fragments to fulfill seasonal species' survival imperatives. "The wall fragments, intended to be impressive barriers, become comic in their epic impotence."

Awarding the prize to the actual wall fragments rather than any particular artist or bulldozer operator is disruptive, agreed spokespersons for the Foundation, who stated that they welcomed the controversy which might ensue if someone actually claimed the prize.

"We hope someone does claim the prize," confessed one of the judges. "We live for moments like that."

Police Claim Not Killing People Is Just Too Hard

By Shelby Coming-Roundemountain

The trial of former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin makes one thing clear according to the Minnesota Police and Peace Officers Association (MPPOA) paying for his defense; not killing people is really, really hard.

"People are unpredictable," stated Brian Peters, the executive director of the MPPOA. "They can be big or small, old or young, sober or drunk. You just never know what you're dealing with."

"People can distract you when you're sitting on their neck and whoops, it's broken," added another MPPOA staff member. "They might ask you the time or what the final score was at the Minnesota Mullets game and boom, you've killed somebody."

"We should get more money if we don't kill them," suggested another police officer. "Otherwise there's no incentive."

"Rights of Nature" Gets Mayor's Boot

By Saul Ipcism

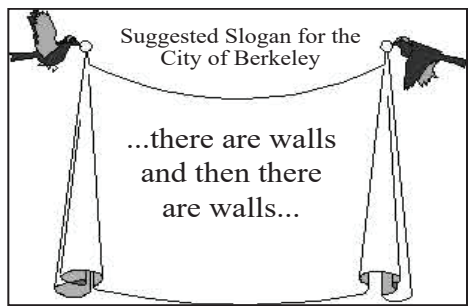

"Mayor Arreguin tends to find Mother Nature annoying, but we thought the committee that recommended her rights be respected might object to sending hers off to a commission that never meets," shrugged one Berkeley city council watcher over the way Mother Nature's rights were frogmarched out of the March 30, 2021 City Council meeting.

"It's just a matter of balance," whispered committee member Kate Harrison. "We had no idea how poorly they got along."

"We're not sure which rights he objected to, but there just wasn't time to ask," explained committee member Sophie Hahn. "It could be anything. For instance, we don't want the place completely over-run with spotted owls."

Mother Nature can be heard sobbing beside the locked door of the Peace and Justice commission which is slated to meet someday on the dark side of the moon.

ASK THE EXPERTS

LENA DEETER knows the answers to everything forwards and backwards.

Dear Lena, I heard a pro-homeless encampment program the other morning on National Public Radio highlighting Santa Rosa's successful experimental effort to provide a safe, sanitary area for people in need. Was I in an alternate universe? I swear I didn't do any drugs that morning and I wasn't asleep.

Dear reader, my money is on the alternate universe, and next time you go there could you call our newsroom and let one of our intrepid reporters come with you? We promise not to highlight such an irresponsible story but we would really like to see the alternate universe for ourselves.

Dear Lena, when Windsor, California Mayor-at-large Dominic Foppoli tells the public that he knows "deep in his heart" that he hasn't done anything criminal, how deep is that?

Dear reader, just as studying the universe requires examining its subatomic particles, studying the actual depth of Windsor Mayor Dominic Foppoli's heart requires an understanding of the present forms of elemental measurement and their potential limitations.

This being said, the actual measurement may have little or no relationship to subatomic particulate behavior or the behavior of Windsor Mayor Dominic Foppoli at a fundamental level or on a human scale; extrapolation from below about 10-35 meters, or the Planck distance scale, has no correspondence to our conventional laws of physics, which explains why men who behave like Windsor Mayor Dominic Foppoli tend not only to avoid criminal conviction but to end up with multiple lucrative movie and book deals.

The uncertainty caused by the quantum effects of nature can be mathematically described by the graphic on page three, a diagram illustrating the inherent uncertainty relation between position and momentum. But Planck's three "constants of nature":

1. G , the gravitational constant of Newton's and Einstein's theories of gravity,
2. h , Planck's constant, or the fundamental quantum constant of nature, and
3. c , the speed of light in a vacuum, all of which presumes you're relaxing in

Democrats Brazenly Plan the Californization of America

By Don Tread

California Democrats have long tried to impose their socialist utopia on the rest of America. The latest, most extreme attempt is a voting rights bill titled "For The People Act" recently passed by the House as HR1, now being considered in the Senate as S1.

YOU MAY THINK THIS IS THE ICONIC view of fog around the Golden Gate Bridge, but you would be wrong; it is the typical exposure Californians get of the usual dose of marijuana smoke every day around 4:20 pm.

Democratic Party planning has a long, dark history. It started in 1965 with the passage of the Federal Voting Rights Act and expanded in 1975 to mandate election materials in suspicious foreign languages. California in particular opened up mail-in voting, implemented on-line voter registration, allowed voter registration to be coordinated with other state agencies and created an independent redistricting commission to eliminate gerrymandering, which really takes the fun out of everything.

Experts agree the HR1 bill is based on California's dangerous model and state that it is the culmination of an insidious plan to make American voting rights (and outcomes) just like those in California where eating other than organic produce will get you thrown out of the book club.

Ethnic minorities reached 50% of California's population in 2000 and now stand at 64%, a ratio guaranteed to challenge conventional traditions such as Cherry Pineapple Marshmallow Jello Salad. White people worry that they may someday be forced to use spices in cooking, and political observers note that Arnold Schwarzenegger was the last Republican elected to statewide office in 2006 and he wasn't even a real Republican although at least he smoked cigars.

While California Democrats claim that expanded voting rights resulted in a record 71% voter participation rate in the 2020 election, Republicans say the increase is due to the availability of election materials in twelve highly questionable foreign languages that hardly anybody really speaks, at least not down at the yacht club. A California Republican observer astutely noted, "what's Murica comin to."

During the last 20 years, Republicans have dropped from 40% to 24% of registered voters in California and are afraid to wear their political buttons. The great state that brought the nation conservative visionaries like Nixon and Reagan has allowed itself to be replaced at the ballot box by people who want to crowd our history books with stuff that happened before 1776. While California appears lost, at a national level the Republican Party is committed to fighting like hell until they start winning elections again and to hold their breath until they do.

Like Republicans in California, Senator Ted Cruz from Cancun is also claiming that HR1 is dangerous and that Democrats will use it to benefit from voter fraud. Republicans have introduced 250 voting measures in 43 states that would target minority groups and broadly limit voting rights. When House Minority Leader Kevin McCarthy was asked by reporters if the elimination of gerrymandering contained in HR1 would likely flip 20 seats from Republicans to Democrats, he talked about eliminating rampant voter fraud, pointed across the room, yelled "squirrel", and ran back to his office. Many in conservative media are still looking for the squirrel or McCarthy, who is not answering calls.

As Democrats continue with their plan to impose California voting rights on the rest of America, this issue is perhaps best summed up by former President Trump who said in reference to the possibility of expanded voting rights contained in HR1, "you'd never have a Republican elected in this country again." Should this prove to be the case, the prospects of finding Cherry Pineapple Marshmallow Jello Salad at your next potluck may indeed be slim.

IF YOU VISIT California be sure you speak parking or are willing to stay for the next six months trying to untangle yourself from costly parking tickets.

an OHCO M.8LE Massage Chair where both you and the manufacturers agree on the minute differences between tapping, kneading, rolling, and that there's somebody making you dinner in the kitchen who agrees with you about what "soon" really means.

The background curvature of space, to get back to Windsor Mayor Dominic Foppoli, can be described as similar to the graceful curves of the forms found in nature, so that a curvature that we commonly use to perform quantum calculations is as likely to be unreliable as one's own assumptions. If someone such as Windsor Mayor Dominic Foppoli presumes that the depth of one's own heart is sufficient to reassure oneself that one is not a selfish, short-sighted, predatory cad, especially if the depth in question is only measurable by the Planck scale, one would obviously be so thoroughly mistaken as to be unable to deflect epic showers of opprobrium at one's next township meeting.

Men such as Windsor's Mayor Dominic Foppoli often confuse "cad" with "cab", short for cabernet, especially in wine country, a semantic uncertainty more predictable than those in quantum physics but nonetheless a factor in Foppoli's own current professional uncertainty. The Scottish origin of the word "cad" has tightened to two common options; 1. : a bus conductor, and 2. : a man who acts with deliberate disregard for another's feelings or rights - a selfish cad.

The Planck measurements required to codify Foppoli's own heart's depth only magnify the intersection of these semantic, political, and mathematical uncertainties.

All of which is to state with certainty that we can't know for certain the depth of Foppoli's heart. But despite the universe's inherent uncertainties, it is certain that Foppoli will get the book deal, the movie deal, and the next wide-eyed winery production intern whose shoes he manages to compliment without actually drooling.

Suspected Fraud at the Masters Golf Tournament

THE AUGUSTA NATIONAL GOLF CLUBHOUSE wants to reassure its membership that it takes fraud seriously and wants to make sure all future tournaments are fair. - Photo by Putnam N. DeHole

By Don Tread

The Republican Georgia state legislature has leaked news about suspected fraud at the Masters Golf Tournament completed recently at the Augusta National course in Georgia, where the winner was Hideki Matsuyama. It is the first time in the 87 year history of the tournament that it has been won by a Japanese man.

Politicians in Georgia have commented that the win was so unprecedented that fraud must be involved. Rudy Giuliani and Sidney Powell are said to be providing legal support at the planned hearings. Georgia Republicans are demanding that the score cards for the tournament be subject to a 100% recount and that all signatures be verified. In addition, they are proposing legislation that would make it more difficult for ethnic minority players to enter such a prestigious tournament.

Given the recent business push-back against new laws which are perceived to be anti-democratic and racist, the Augusta National club is not concerned. They informally commented that should the PGA take similar action to move this trademarked event out of state, they would hold a replacement tournament at Augusta entitled "We're the Real Masters".
